NUTRIENTS (from p1)

In addition, public utilities lawyers, engineers, and scientific and statistical expert consultants argued that there is no state money available for what would be considered an unfunded state mandate, meaning the costs of treatment would be passed on to customers. Cost estimates to comply with this first round of capital improvements start at $2.4 billion.

Small victories for treatment facilities

One victory for the wastewater utilities is that, for the next 10 years, the nitrogen limits in treated effluent will not be as strict as originally proposed. Instead of having to treat to a level of 10 milligrams per liter (or 10 parts per million), the limit is 15 mg/l. That change was made in Regulation 85, which affects the state's largest 44 facilities. But, again, this change only lasts 10 years; after that, the numbers in Regulation 31 take effect.

Regulation 31 sets more stringent total phosphorus and total nitrogen "interim values," starting in 2022. But the victory for the wastewater utilities here is that these numbers will be site-specific instead of a one-size-fits-all standard. Each treatment facility will have to prove it is doing no significant harm to waterways when it requests site-specific
